

As a child, as a man, in his old age always a most glorious hero, son of a noble house, he was reared from his earliest years by the Countess of Richmond, his nursling aunt on his mother's side. Grown thence to manhood, he came to the court of King Henry the Eighth. The king had at that two daughters, for both of whom this most illustrious man was chosen, being given to the one as guardian, to the other as chamberlain. O how often did England experience his might in war. Now fierce Lincolnshire is in turmoil, now great France rages, twice subdued by his signal courage. Stirred up under Edward the Sixth, Norfolk was in uproar. Thither is he sent under the foremost leaders, among whom, and all men, this man was either first or second to none, in war. At last, full of honorable years, chamberlain elect to Queen Elizabeth, he died and left progeny like unto himself in virtue.
